Non stinky dish cloths? Is it possible?

Our kitchen sees plenty of action as it is here where we prepare and cook our meals.

The aftermath of all the cooking means plenty of dishes to be washed and stored away with the counters wiped down to remove any food debris. Usually, I recycle any excess cloth in my home or just purchase regular sponges, but I noticed that they tend to reek after a while.

No matter how many times I rinse them under running water, I always end up with stinky dish rags! Although I did not have the same issue with the sponges, I read that since sponges take a while before they dry, germs tend to accumulate on them.

How horrible!

Just imagine having to wipe the counters where I prepare my food with these two. Think of all the germs I've been spreading without my knowledge.

After encountering this problem several times, I decided to look for an alternative cleaning tool that brought me to non stinky dish cloths. How will they fare? Here's what I found out.

Dish Cloths vs Sponges

Cotton dish cloths are often used for cleaning kitchen counters because they tend to be soft and non-scratching. I admit that these are my go-to cleaning tools because I can simply wash it afterwards. The only problem is that after several uses, I end up with smelly dish rags.

On a good note, I learned how to get rid of the smell by putting all my dirty dish cloths in a large pot filled with water, half a cup of vinegar, and a teaspoon or two of my liquid dish soap then bringing it to a boil. You have to stir the pot from time to time then drain afterwards.

Sponges, on the other hand, do a decent job of removing the tough food stains if they give them a good scrub. However, I don't dry them properly which means that they have become a hotbed for germs, molds, and other bacteria.

Experts recommend that if you are going to use one to clean your kitchen, better pop your damp sponge in the microwave for a minute to eliminate all the bacteria. Sounds good!

Why Non Stinky Dish Cloths are Better

If cotton dish cloths and sponges aren't exactly great for cleaning, what can you use? I have tried various products already in search of best dish cloths, and one stood out which is the All-Purpose Dish Cloth from The Crown Choice. Here's what I love about it.

Odor-Free Dishcloths

Sponges and dish cloths often smell bad after a while because of the buildup of bacteria, but the non stinky dish cloths from The Crown Choice are smell-free. This is because the material used is non-absorbent meaning that bacteria will not be able to accumulate. Also, it tends to dry up quickly which is another reason why it doesn't smell after several uses.

Non-Scratch Design

Another reason why I enjoy using this all-purpose dish cloth is that it has a non-scratch design. I have used it on various materials like cast iron, plastic, and porcelain even and I did not see any damage to them.

Upon closer inspection, I realized that what makes this dish cloth effective in cleaning without becoming smelly is that it has soft bristles that can help loosen up any debris without being too rough.
